In Switzerland, the Swiss Association for Child and Adolescent Psychology is the main association of psychologists practicing in the field of school psychology / educational psychology, or more generally in the field of child and adolescent psychology. SKJP / ASPEA / ASPEE is an affiliate member of ISPA, the International School Psychology Association.

The Swiss Association for Child and Adolescent Psychology has some 700 members: university trained psychologists, most of them with a degree equivalent to a Master degree. They work in the educational system as school psychologists, some are clinical psychologists or child guidance counselors working within institutions or in private practice. The total number of school psychologists in Switzerland is unknown. It is estimated to be around 800.

As the educational system in Switzerland is regulated on the level of the 26 cantons (states or provinces), the legal norms which apply to school psychology, as well as the working conditions including functions and salaries are very diverse in the different parts of the country. In Switzerland there are 4 national languages which are spoken in 4 different regions. 64% of the 7 million inhabitants speak German, 20% speak French, 7% speak Italian and 1% speaks Romanic. Most SKJP members live and work in the German-speaking part of Switzerland. In the French-speaking part, psychologists are rather organized in regional associations of psychologists.

English is a foreign language in Switzerland. Students learn it at school, mostly as a third language. Psychologists who work with children or adolescents have to speak the local language, in German-speaking Switzerland they have to understand the regional dialect. This requirement as well as restrictions of the labour market (for professionals from outside Switzerland or the European Union) are often a barrier for English-speaking psychologists who wish to work in Switzerland.
